The Strangest Terrible History of Bureaucracy

~~Discussion~~

To find the entrance to Headquarters, upon entering the first numbered room, go in any direction.

Thenceforth, subtract the ~~previous~~ room number of the previous room from the number of the current room.

Take the last digit of the difference.

If it is zero go East; if one go South

if two, Up; if three, North;

if four, Down; if five, West.

For example, the first numbered room is 64;

the second is 105. The difference is 41,

making the last digit one; you should go South

in this case. Failure will return you to the Antechamber.

~~Look. Uhm...~~

You struggle up the air-shaft, and find yourself back above ground, where you see a primitive landing strip hacked out of the jungle.

Look. Uhm...

We're not quite sure how to put this, so we got the lawyers to draft something instead.

"Infocom Inc. currently possesses no mechanism for allowing proactive product end-users" -- sorry about the tedious '80s MBA jargon, but you know how lawyers LOVE bull like that -- "to escape from interactive fiction situations without having made the least attempt to solve the puzzles.

"The normal penalty under these circumstances would be death. However, we are prepared to offer you the option of returning whence you came."

"Actually, this isn't really an option. Look at it from our point of view.

Suppose you said "To hell with it, I'd rather die", where would we be then? We'd have no option but to sue the guts out of you. And have you the remotest idea of the paperwork THAT would involve? We have wives and families, you know, and girlfriends, and sometimes we just like to go bowling or just hang out at the gas station, drinking Fresca and bad-mouthing the treasury.

"So: back you go."

Sorry about that. That's what the lawyers say, so that's what has to happen.
